The North and East rivers and the bay were rendered unsafe for navigation by the dense bank of fog which settled on the water and made it impossible for pilots to see more than a soat's length abad. Every possible precaution was taken on the ferries and tugs and other craft to avoid collisions. A continuous screeching of whistles was kept up, and men were posted in the prows and along the sides of the boats to keep a sharp lookout for other vessels.

For over an hour, from 7.30 o'clock until nearly 3 o'clock, the fog was as dense as it was possible for it to be without asserting itself more forcibly in rain.
